Abstract

I would like to present an artist talk on a recent performance of my interactive piece for dancer, Titlipur. I will present the performance on DVD, accompanied with a discussion of the project itself. My presentation will focus on the demands and aesthetic of performance practice in working with new technologies, the technical construction and musical intentions behind the piece, the experience and observations of working in collaboration with video artist and dancer, and the aesthetic response of the dancer in her interaction with new technology of wearing sensors. I will also discuss the piece in the context of works that utilize such interfaces for musical expression, as a way to stimulate ideas for future research. I will elaborate on the way this piece connects with ideas of the body and its relationship to music and live performance.

Abstract

Since the 1960s New Zealand composers have shown an interest in working native birdsong into their music. This paper examines the use that various composers – most notably Douglas Lilburn – have made of tape recordings of North Island kokako made by John Kendrick of the Wildlife Division of the Department of Internal Affairs (c.1969). In addition, the paper includes a presentation of a new electroacoustic work of the author, entitled Kokako Triptych – a work composed with a full knowledge of, and making deliberate reference to, these earlier compositions.
